Why Video Games Don't Get Art - CrankyBear ===== dahart It doesn't matter what someone else thinks a work of art is or isn't, that doesn't make it yours. You can't decide for others. Art is a personal experience that cannot be defined by outsiders. --- arethuza I don't think that this necessarily follows from the rest of the post - if you can detect a work of art (for instance by experiencing something similar) you probably can't make the observation purely from the outside - that is part of what makes art art. ----- ZanyProgrammer I don't disagree with the argument, but it kind of depends on what you want art to be. Often, people who claim they recognize Art think it should be more like a museum, or be available only to the rich. I'd argue it's not just individuality of a work, but the accessibility of the work. Just ask the people who crowdfunded a successful work of art, rather than the art institute, for the art in their eyes. --- CrankyBear Also, for the people who crowdfunded it, it's a matter of simply funding 09e8f5149f

Elizabeth Warren is using her platform on the campaign trail to speak to issues of racial bias in policing and white supremacy. | Manuel Balce Ceneta/AP Photo 2020 elections Warren pushes Trump's aggressive rhetoric on national security The Massachusetts senator wants the president to apologize for his 'race-baiting and fearmongering.' As the Democratic presidential field narrows, Warren is more aggressively inserting herself into the volatile national political scene, speaking out more forcefully than her other rivals and introducing policies that appear designed to differentiate her from the rest of the field. Warren has focused on blunt talk about President Donald Trump and the reality of police killings in recent days. She has been surprised and frustrated by what she sees as a president who "normalizes" white supremacy, and she's eager to make an example of the current administration when Democrats debate questions of national security and foreign policy. "I am so sick and tired of Donald Trump and the way he's talking about immigrants and people of color," she told reporters in New Hampshire. "The whole premise of this administration is based on white nationalism. I don't know any other way to describe it." Her remarks Wednesday highlight what some believe could be an end-of-the-campaign emphasis on issues of race and policing as Warren looks to make her candidacy a hard-fought battle for progressives, particularly on the left flank. "I think she's trying to shift the narrative of what is a very hard-edge race, where, I think, if you look at the polling, she's probably in fifth place, but she's coming out more aggressively than the rest of the field," said Democratic strategist Jim Manley. "She's more likely to talk about issues like reverse racism that some of the other candidates are already talking about." Warren's shift in strategy also appears to stem from shifts among her rivals in the past week. After a series of early trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, South Bend, Indiana, Mayor Pete Buttigieg has become the favorite to emerge from the state party caucuses in a win in the upcoming Iowa caucuses. Buttigieg, who told Democratic donors earlier this month that he would use his campaign to "transform"
