Another Souls-like game is Undertale, which is perhaps the most self-aware game out there. It ends on a very bleak note, but the attempt at critically examining the genre is well worth the price of admission. Its gameplay is superb, and I don't really have any complaints about it, really. An interactive narrative is a rare animal in video games. Even video games that employ traditional story-telling genres such as adventure and action typically don't require players to speak to complete the game. While there are exceptions, they generally play as linear or sequel titles. Thief is one of those few exceptions, and in a way, the entire game pivots on the decisions and opinions that players make. While many games are painted with a dichotomy of good versus evil, Thief reminds players that humans, as a whole, are capable of much more than they realize. The highly enigmatic (and aptly named) Donut County is a fairly light-hearted narrative-driven adventure title that is guaranteed to have players chuckling throughout. The storyline is simple enough, but the aspect that makes this game such a treat lies in the unexpected and bizarre worlds that keep players guessing on what to expect next. The game starts from the premise that the human race has enslaved a race of ape-like mutants and they in return enslave the humans. The narrative is dark, with the same amount of absurdity that made Donut County so enjoyable. The fact that Alex Mercer, a former surgeon turned deep sea explorer, is a satirical take on scientists from the likes of David Attenborough and Stephen Hawking makes this game even more humorous.
